The Small Business Administration's 8(a) certification program recognizes and rewards small businesses that have the potential to serve small businesses or the government. For more than 30 years, these partnerships have been proven effective in helping small businesses receive access to contract opportunities, soft loans, and other SBA-guaranteed resources. Now, the rules for the 8(a) certification are changing. In May 2010, new certification rules were adopted in response to the Economic Recovery Act and the Small Business Jobs and Credit Act of 2010. The new certification rules were meant to help small businesses get certified through different routes, to help eliminate barriers to certification, and to ensure that the certification requirements are clear and standardized. The new rules will have an impact on agencies that are already working with small businesses. Changes will require agencies to reevaluate their certification plans, their recruitment and outreach efforts, and most importantly, they will require reevaluation of the data used to support small business certification. The new 8(a) rules include: Reimplementation of the Existing 8(a) Federal Industry Contract Program Issuance of 8(a) Certifications for New Services

In order for such products to be transported and stored, the products must be held fast or restrained against creep or flow. The restraint can be accomplished by a variety of techniques such as, for example, providing a shrink fit, wire wrapping or a clamp or other restraining devices. The inability to restrain the product prevents the product from being stored in a desired position during the shipping and/or storing process. Because the products may be later re-positioned, it may be beneficial to allow the products to move slightly, such as to ensure that the product is in the desired position to be re-positioned, or that the product is restrained during shipment and/or storage.from the archives of matthias krause strict-mode is obviously "use strict" "use warnings", but whether it would catch silent mistakes like missing semicolons or undefined names must be determined by each user's use of the script.
